

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE

October 26, 2018

Media Contact: Glenn Lammi | glammi@wlf.org | 202-588-0302

WLF Asks Supreme Court to Overturn Decision Exposing Employers to Massive Back-Pay Liability

(Parker Drilling Management Services, Inc. v. Newton)

“By overturning a half-century of settled law regarding wages for ‘sleep time,’ the Ninth Circuit has exposed the oil and gas industry to massive retroactive liability. Elementary considerations of fairness dictate that employers should have an opportunity to know what the law is and to conform their conduct accordingly.”

—Richard Samp, WLF Chief Counsel

WASHINGTON, DC—Washington Legal Foundation (WLF) today urged the U.S. Supreme Court to review (and ultimately overturn) a Ninth Circuit wage-and-hour ruling that could expose oil and gas companies to hundreds of millions of dollars in back-pay liability. In a brief in Parker Drilling Management Services, Inc. v. Newton, WLF argues that the Ninth Circuit improperly rejected a half-century of federal law governing the wages paid to employees stationed on off-shore oil platforms.

Because of oil platforms’ remote location, employees generally remain on the platforms for several weeks at a time, even though they perform work at most 12 hours per day. Employees receive premium wages for the hours worked, but they are not paid for the hours spent sleeping and resting on oil platforms. This wage-and-hour scheme fully accords with federal labor law; and a law passed by Congress in the 1950s, the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act (OCSLA), states that federal law applies to activities on oil platforms. Federal courts in Texas and Louisiana (whose coasts are home to most of the nation’s oil platforms) have long interpreted OCSLA as barring application of state law except where there are gaps in federal law that are in need of filling.

But earlier this year the Ninth Circuit held, in a case involving an oil platform off the coast of California, that California wage-and-hour laws apply and that California requires employees to be paid 24 hours per day if their employer does not permit them to return home at the end of their shifts. WLF’s brief argues that the appeals court’s ruling misinterprets OCSLA and exposes employers to massive retroactive liability simply for paying its employees in reasonable reliance on the law as it was then understood. WLF urges the Supreme Court to grant review to resolve the conflict between the rulings of the Ninth Circuit and other federal appeals courts.

Celebrating its 41st year, WLF is America’s premier public-interest law firm and policy center advocating for free-market principles, limited government, individual liberty, and the rule of law.

###