On January 12, the U.S. Supreme Court will hear arguments on whether a state or federal court is the proper judicial venue to hear state claims of environmental harm filed against a federal government contractor. The damages awarded, private attorney-public official litigation coordination, World War II-era facts, and broader due-process concerns, however, make this no ordinary procedural or statutory dispute. Our panelists will dig into the intriguing background, discuss the legal arguments on the questions presented, and explain the broader implications of this high-stakes case.
